

Reflexions of M.E.: an exploration into the impact ME/CFS has on the lives of young people

To have ME is to experience hell twice over, firstly through the devastation of the disease itself, and secondly through the lack of diagnosis, information and support that most sufferers are still having to endure (Macintyre, 1998, p.ix). Although, as an illness ME/CFS has been in existence for many years, it has taken time for the medical profession and other experts who have dealings with patients to accept it as a real disease, and this appears to be the case, even more so, when young people have the illness. Despite there being no diagnostic test many more doctors and other relevant professions now accept ME/CFS as a genuine illness. Nevertheless, there still exists controversy over the kind of illness it is, how it affects sufferers and how it should be treated. Regardless of such conflict, ME/CFS is classified by the World Health Organisation (WHO) as a disease of the nervous system, a neurological illness ICD 10 G93.3. ME/CFS is a chronic condition that has an overwhelming and destructive effect on the physical and psychological functional ability of those who have it. For that reason, the intent is to address ME/CFS from a personal perspective, looking in particular at the physical and psychological aspects and how they impact on a young persons life. Much research has been done into how ME/CFS affects adult sufferers. Research is also available regarding how the parents of children with ME/CFS are affected and how they see their children as having been affected. However, even though the 2002 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) declared that children and young people are entitled to have [their] own opinion, which is listened to and taken seriously (Save the Children, nd), very little research specifically addresses how they experience ME/CFS. Therefore, this project will concentrate on the voice of young people. Conducting such an investigation might highlight areas where young people can be better supported as well as giving them a voice.
